The following is a transcript of a video message posted on Time Warner Cable Inc.'s internal website on May 26, 2015 from the Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of the company to employees.

Good afternoon everyone. I'm sure by now all of you have heard the exciting news that we announced this morning, which is that Time Warner Cable will be combining with Charter and our longtime partners at Bright House to create an industry-leading cable company for the next generation. Specifically, Time Warner Cable will merge with Charter. At the same time, Charter has entered into a transaction pursuant to which it will combine with Bright House and that three-way deal will result in roughly 23 million customers being served by the new company across 41 states across the country – a pretty powerful and compelling opportunity. I would tell you that I think today is a great day for Time Warner Cable. It's a great day for our shareholders. It's a great day for our customers. And it's a terrific day for you, our employees.

Let me start with our shareholders. The transaction values Time Warner Cable at $79 billion. That valuation translates to roughly $195 to $200 per Time Warner Cable share – depending on how you value the Charter stock involved in the transaction. And it results in Time Warner Cable shareholders owning as much as 44% of the new company going forward. Those valuations represent a significant premium over where Time Warner Cable shares were trading prior to the transaction. It also represents a meaningful premium to the value that was attributed to Time Warner Cable in the Comcast deal. So all in all, a really successful outcome for our shareholders and as you guys know, I've talked a lot over the last year and a half about maximizing shareholder value. I think this morning we certainly delivered on that commitment.

Next, our customers. I think this is a tremendous deal for Time Warner Cable customers. This transaction brings together three companies who are wholly committed to investing in our network and our products. Three companies whose philosophy is to put the customer first in everything that we do. And, I have every reason to believe that the best of the three companies will be brought to bear as we continue to deliver great customer experiences going forward. So I think this is a truly terrific day for Time Warner Cable customers.

Last, but not least, our employees. I think the opportunities for all of you in the combined Charter-Time Warner Cable-Bright House are truly limitless. This is a company that will have meaningful opportunities for our folks. Tom Rutledge will be Chairman and CEO, and Tom has committed to a best-in-breed philosophy in terms of selecting management for the new company. He has also said that he expects that our regional operating structure will remain largely intact following the merger. They've talked a lot about insourcing call centers and that should give rise to the need for additional talent, probably from Time Warner Cable, to manage and man our new call centers. And I think the bottom line is, as the largest company in the three party deal, it's reasonable to assume that a significant portion of the new company's workforce is going to come from Time Warner Cable. So I think that really creates some very exciting opportunities for all of you.

Let me talk a little bit about the regulatory approval process. Given what we've just gone through over the last 18 months, it would be reasonable for you to ask the question can this transaction get done, given that the Comcast-Time Warner Cable merger did not? And I will tell you that I am confident that it will in fact get done. I know you're probably saying, "Well Rob was confident about the last deal getting done," but this deal is a fundamentally different transaction. In that, the company that we create as a result of the combinations will be significantly smaller even than Comcast is today. There will be no vertical integration. What I mean by that is Charter-Time Warner Cable-Bright House will have no national programming networks to speak of; they will have no movie studio, no broadcast network – all things that made the Comcast-Time Warner Cable merger somewhat more complicated. I think we can meaningfully demonstrate that this deal is in the public interest and is very pro-consumer, and I expect that over the course of the coming months, our folks in Washington will do that. So I feel pretty good about the prospects for the deal getting done. We wouldn't have entered into it, if we didn't feel that way.

I'll respond to a question that I know is coming because it was a hot topic in the last deal. If the deal does not get done for some reason and, again, I believe it will, Charter will owe Time Warner Cable a $2 billion breakup fee. So, in a sense, we have somewhat of an insurance policy in the event that the deal doesn't go through as planned.

So what's next? What's next is largely what has transpired over the last 15, 16 months. We're going to keep running the business until the transaction occurs. Continue to invest in our network. Invest in our products. Invest in our people. We're going to keep delivering great experiences to our customers and we're going to continue to create value by doing that. And I have every confidence, based on your track record, that all of you will continue to do what you do as well as you have during the past period of deal pendency.

I don't in any way trivialize the difficulty of doing your jobs when the world around you is as chaotic as the one in which we live. But I have the highest regard for your ability to remain focused in spite of all the distractions. And I'm really counting on your proving my confidence correct. So there will be plenty of time for questions over the coming days. We'll undoubtedly be sharing a whole bunch of information with you about the terms of the deals. Specific provisions we've negotiated for the benefit of our employees and specifics around the imminent integration planning efforts. But until then, I would simply say, thank you for your continued support. Thank you for your professionalism. Thank you for your commitment to Time Warner Cable. We wouldn't be here today without all of your incredible efforts, especially over the last 16 months. So thank you and we'll talk to you soon.
